PREFACE TO THE LETTER V.

In this portion of the Dictionary there are 4219 Main words, 393 Special Combinations explained under these, 1492 Obvious Combinations, and 1671 Subordinate entries of obsolete or variant forms; in all 7775 entries. Of the Main words 1074 are marked † as obsolete, and 257 are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.

Comparison with Johnson's and some recent Dictionaries gives the following results:—

	Johnson.	Cassell's 'Encyclopædic'.	'Century' Dict.	Funk's 'Standard'.	Here.
Words recorded	684	2790	3744	3168	7775
Words illustrated by quotations	557	1145	1353	448	5954
Number of quotations	1738	1881	4139	598	40,418

In the corresponding portion of Richardson the quotations number 1935.

For the reasons given in the introductory article on the letter, the words beginning with V are almost entirely of foreign origin, and the great majority either directly or indirectly have their source in Latin. Most of the important Latin stems with initial v are represented in English, and many of them very extensively, so that they frequently occupy large and continuous portions of the following pages. Many of the words from these stems are also found, with little change of form, in all the modern Romanic languages; the vocabulary throughout this letter thus corresponds very closely with that of dictionaries in these tongues. As usual, many of the stems and their derivatives have passed into English through French, which has at different periods contributed a large number of common words, as vain, vale, valiant, valley, value, vanish, vanquish, vantage, varnish, etc. Notable among these is the adj. and adv. VERY, which forms one of the longest articles in this portion of the dictionary. An interesting group is also presented by the words formed with the prefix VANT-. The prefix vis-, vi-, originally introduced from French, subsequently assumed the Latin form VICE-, but has survived unaltered in Viscount and its derivatives. The other Romanic languages are represented by adoptions from Spanish and Portuguese, as vanilla, vaquero, vara, vega[1], vellon, veranda, verruga, vintem, and from Italian, as vendetta, vermicelli, viola[2], violin, violon, violoncello, virtu, virtuoso, vista, viva, volcano. The Romanic element is also prominent among the proper names and adjectives formed from these, the number of which in some parts of this section is above the average.

The remaining sources are of limited extent and for the most part of less importance. A few entries are southern English variants of forms in f-, as vade v.[1], van sb.[1], vane, vat, vease, vell v., vent sb.[1], and vixen. An exceptional instance of this substitution is found in veneer for the earlier fineer. This is one of a small number of words which have been adopted from the other Germanic languages; among these is veer, to let out (from Dutch vieren), which has hitherto been confused in dictionaries with the unrelated veer, to turn round (from French virer). Others are the Dutch veldt, vlei, vrouw, and the Scandinavian Valhalla, Valkyrie, viking, voe, and vole. The remoter European, with some Oriental, African, and American languages, have contributed such miscellaneous words as vaivode (voivode), vakeel, vampire, Veda, verst, vicuña, viscacha, vizier, vodka, voodoo.

Words of similar form, but of different origin and meaning, are rarer than in some other portions of the alphabet; there are, however, seven substantives with the spelling vice. The variety of spelling possible in the older stages of English is well illustrated in the forms of verjuice, victual, vinegar, and vouchsafe; the lack of obvious meaning in the latter was no doubt the main cause of the extraordinary variety of forms and spellings in which it appears down to the 16th century.

The historical interest of many of the words beginning with V is considerable. A number of these have ecclesiastical or religious associations, as valor (1 d), Vatican, Vaticanism, etc., Vaudois, Venite, verger, vernicle, veronica[2], versicle, vesper, vestiary, vestry, viaticum, vicar, vicarage, victim (introduced by the Rhemish translators of the Bible), vigil, virgin, virtue, vision, etc. Others are of importance for social, political, or legal history, as vaccination, vagabond, vagrant, valentine, valet, varlet, vassal, vavassour, velocipede, ventilation, ventriloquism, venue, verderer, verdict, verge sb.[1], vice-chancellor, vicegerent, victualler, viewer, villa, village, villein, virgate, voidee, voider, volunteer, voluper, vote (before 1600 almost exclusively in Scottish use), vouch, vouchee, voucher, voyage, and vulgar. Many other words are of interest for various reasons, as vernier, verse, vignette (with the earlier form vinet), viol, violin, vogue, volley, volume, vortex, etc.

The material first collected for V was arranged and sub-edited by the Rev. T. H. Sheppard in 1883. Much new material was incorporated, and the sub-editing revised, for V—VAGABOND by the Rev. C. B. Mount in 1908; VAGABOND—VANQUISH by Mr. C. B. Winchester in 1908; and VANQUISH—VYWER by the Rev. W. B. R. Wilson in 1910–13.

The staff which assisted in the preparation of the letter consisted of Mr. L. F. Powell, Mr. G. Watson, Mrs. Powell, Misses Elsie M. R. and Rosfrith A. N. R. Murray, Miss I. B. Hutchen, and Mr. E. N. Martin. Proofs were read by Canon J. T. Fowler, and verification at the British Museum was done by Mr. W. W. Jenkinson. For information on special points thanks are due to Canon Fowler, Dr. D. Hay Fleming, Mr. E. W. Hulme, Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart., and Mr. E. J. Thomas.

PREFATORY NOTE.

IN this portion of the Dictionary there are 4219 Main words, 393 Special Combinations explained under these, 1492 Obvious Combinations, and 1671 Subordinate entries of obsolete or variant forms; in all 7775 words. Of the Main words 1074 are marked † as obsolete, and 257 are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.

Comparison with Johnson's and some recent Dictionaries gives the following results:—

In the corresponding portion of Richardson the quotations number 1935.

The following prefatory notes have been issued with the Sections of which this Part is composed:—

V—VERIFICATIVE.

For the reasons given in the introductory article on the letter, the words beginning with V- are almost entirely of foreign origin, and the great majority either directly or indirectly have their source in Latin. Most of the important Latin stems with initial v- are represented in English, and many of them very extensively, as a glance over the pages of this section will show. As usual, many of these stems have passed through French, which has thus at different periods contributed a large number of common words, as vain, vale, valiant, valley, value, vanish, vanquish, vantage, varnish, etc. An interesting group from this source is formed by the words enumerated under the prefix VANT-. The other Romanic languages are represented by vanilla, vaquero, vara, vega[1], vellon, vendetta, veranda, and a few others. The Romanic element is also prominent among the proper names, and adjectives formed from these, the number of which in this section is above the average.

The remaining sources are of limited extent and for the most part of less importance. A few entries are southern variants of forms in f-, as vade v.[1], van sb.[1], vane, vat, vease, vell v., and vent sb.[1]; an exceptional instance of this substitution is found in veneer for earlier fineer. This is one of a small number of words which have been adopted from the other Germanic languages: the most interesting of these is veer, to let out (from Dutch vieren), which has hitherto been confused in dictionaries with the unconnected veer, to turn round (from French virer). The remoter European, and some Oriental, tongues have contributed such words as vaivode, vakeel, valonia, vampire, Veda.

A considerable number of the articles in this section have a historical or antiquarian interest, as those on vaccination, vagabond, vagrant, valentine, valet, varlet, varvel, vassal, vavassour, velocipede, ventail, ventilation, ventriloquism, venue, venville, verderer, verdict, verge sb.[1], verger, etc.

In respect of vocabulary this section presents no material difference of character from that containing the earlier portion of V, the great majority of the words being either directly or indirectly of Latin origin. Large portions are occupied by derivatives of the usual types from such Latin words or stems as vērus, vermis, verna, vers-, vert-, vertex, vestis, etc. Both in the earlier and later periods French influence is also prominent; in addition to many substantives and verbs, this has supplied the common adj. and adv. VERY, which occupies one of the longest articles in the section. The prefix vis-, vi-, originally introduced from French, subsequently assumed the Latin form VICE-, but has survived unaltered in Viscount and its derivatives. Other Romanic languages are represented by the Italian vermicelli, viola[2], violin, violon, violoncello, virtu, virtuoso, the Spanish verruga, and the Portuguese vintem. The few contributions from other sources include the Russian verst, the Scandinavian viking, and the South American vicuña and viscacha.

Words of similar form, but of different origin and meaning, are rare; there are however seven substantives with the spelling vice. The variety of spelling possible in older English is well illustrated in the forms of verjuice, victual, and vinegar, and the uncertainty in the pronunciation of some Latin words is exemplified in vertigo and videlicet.

The historical interest of many words in this section is considerable. A number of these have ecclesiastical or religious associations, as vernicle, veronica[2], versicle, vesper, vestiary, vestry, viaticum, vicar, vicarage, victim (introduced by the Rhemish translators of the Bible), vigil, virgin, virtue, vision, visit, visitation, etc. Others are of importance for social, political, or legal history, as vice-chancellor, vicegerent, victualler, view, viewer, vill, village, villein, villeinage, virgate, while the arts and sciences are represented by such words as vernier, verse, vestibule, vignette (with the earlier form vinet), villa, viol, violin, etc.

VISOR—VYWER.

In this concluding section of V the vocabulary continues to be predominantly of Romanic origin, and consists largely of adoptions of, or formations on, common Latin words and stems. Many of these are found, with little change of form, in all the modern Romanic languages. Of more distinctive forms, the majority have, as usual, been adopted from French, as vogue, voice, void, volley, vouch, vow, vowel, voyage, etc. Italian has contributed a few words, including vista, viva, and volcano. The native English element is represented by only one important word, vixen, and very few have been adopted from the other Germanic languages, only the Scand. voe and vole, and the Dutch vlei and vrouw, calling for any special notice. Of words from more remote sources, the most important are the Slavonic Vlach, vodka, and voivode, the Arabic vizier, and the American negro voodoo.

Although the section includes many important words, there are comparatively few which present any striking features in their history or the development of their senses. The most interesting in this respect are vocable, vogue, volley, volume, volunteer, vortex, vote (before 1600 almost exclusively in Scottish use), vouch, voyage, and vulgar. Among older words of historical interest are Vitry, voidee, voider, voluper, volvelle, vouchee, and voucher. The lack of obvious meaning in vouchsafe was no doubt the main cause of the extraordinary variety of forms and spellings in which it appears down to the 16th century.

V.

V (vī), the 22nd letter of the modern English and the 20th of the ancient Roman alphabet, was in the latter an adoption of the early Greek vowel-symbol V, now also represented by U and Y (q.v.), but in Latin was employed also with the value of the Greek digamma (viz. w), to which it corresponds etymologically. When not purely vocalic, it still denoted this sound at the time when the earliest Latin loan-words were adopted in the Teutonic languages; consequently such words beginning with v appear in Old English with w. Under the Empire, however, the semi-vocalic sound gradually changed to a bilabial consonant, and finally became the labio-dental voiced spirant now denoted by the letter in English and various other languages. This development did not take place in Old English; and no v, whether bilabial or labio-dental, occurred initially in the older Teutonic languages, although the sound was common in other positions (in OE. denoted by f, in early texts by b).

In OE. dictionaries there is thns no set of words with initial V, one or two Latin words adopted at a late period usually appearing with f, as fann, fers (but also vers), from L. vannus, versus. The first appearance of V-words is found in those ME. texts which begin to show a distinct French influence, as the Ancren Riwle; even early writers like Orm and Lazamon, while not free from the use of French words, do not employ any beginning with v. The number of such words steadily increases in later texts, and is subsequently greatly reinforced by direct adoptions from Latin, by new formations on Latin stems, and by adoptions from other Romanic languages. The other sources of initial V are of minor importance. The change of w to v, which took place in the middle period of the Scandinavian languages, is represented in a few words, as Valhalla, valkyrie, viking, but otherwise the words with this initial are chiefly derived from languages not directly related to English. A small number of words, however, as vat, vixen, exemplify the voicing of f- peculiar to southern (now only south-western) dialects. This change is not indicated in OE. spelling, and how far it had developed in speech is uncertain, but in southern ME. texts all native words (rarely those of French or Latin origin) beginning with f may appear with v- (or its equivalent u-); the more important variant forms due to this cause are entered in their places below. Conversely words properly having v- are occasionally written with f-, and there is evidence that this is not merely graphic, but represents an actual pronunciation. ('Eaen so oure Englishmen vse to speake in Essexe, for they say fineger for vineger, feale for veale, & contrary wyse a voxe for a foxe, voure for foure, etc.' 1546 Langley, tr. Pol. Verg. de Invent. I. vi. 14.)

When not initial, v occurs freely in native words as well as in those of Latin or other origin. In the former it represents OE. f when voiced, as in æfen even, drifan drive, lufu love. The use of f (or ff) in such words was partly retained in ME. (and especially in Sc. down to the 16th century); but even in late OE. u is frequently substituted, and in early ME. (as in med.L. and OF.) u and v come into general use to denote the sound in all positions. It was only in the 17th century that these two letters, both of which had been employed in a double function (see U), were finally distinguished as vowel and consonant; and down to the 19th century words beginning with either letter continued to form one series in dictionaries.

In some ME. (chiefly northern) manuscripts, and in many Scottish texts of the 15th and 16th centuries, v is more or less frequently written in place of w, while conversely w is freely written instead of v. These forms are merely graphic, and do not imply a phonetic interchange of w and v (though in mod. north-eastern Sc. wr- has become vr-). In south-eastern English dialects the change of v- to w- does occur, and older representations of Cockney speech exhibit a converse change of w- to v-, which recent investigators have been unable to verify as still existent. The latter change is illustrated in the following quotations.

1803 Pegge Anecd. Eng. Lang. (1814) 77 Villiam, I vants my vig...Vitch vig, Sir?..Vy, the vite vig in the vooden vig-hox, vitch I vore last Vensday at the westry. 1824 *Spirit Publ. Elision of v when not initial has taken place extensively in dialects, especially those of the North and Scotland, as in deil devil, shule shovel, hairst harvest. In standard English this is represented by such words as hawk, head, lark, lord, and is specially indicated in a few archaic or poetic forms, as e'en even, e'er ever, ne'er never, o'er over.
